DAVID BROKENSHIRE

Born 1925 in Thames. Registered Architect practising in Christchurch — part time worker in clay. His work is mainly coiled which gives maximum freedom. His interest is in single large sculptural forms and usually works through a series of variations on a theme. He has exhibited throughout New Zealand and in Australia, Fiji, Italy, England and the U.S.A.

ROY COWAN

Worked as a teacher, graphic designer and publisher, and engineer, then established himself in the vocation of the arts. Produces sculpture, paintings, prints and pottery, the latter including domestic ware and sculpture, and is at present working on architectural ceramics and metalwork.

IAN FIRTH

"An empathy with clay, coupled with the belief that communication is an essential function of the potter, motivates my desire to extract from all the seriousness that potting is, a sense of joy, which is also potting. Pots with an individual personality parallel with a sense of belonging to another or larger group or family."

MARGARET MILNE

"I started potting about 15 years ago, working for some years with a small electric kiln. For the three years my workshop has been a somewhat restored derelict cottage (which I love). I work in stoneware, in a 50 cubic ft. oil fired kiln, and enjoy making pots which will become part of everyday living — to be used and handled."

PETER STICHBURY

Trained as a teacher, 3rd year specialisation in art. In 1957 was awarded an Associated Art Societies Travelling Scholarship for two years. Worked with Bernard Leach at St. Ives, and with Michael Cardew in Nigeria. 1959 to 1969 was Lecturer in Art at Ardmore Teachers College. Now potting full time in Manurewa.

THE GUILD

The New Zealand Potters' Guild is a relatively small organisation established by a group of professional potters for their mutual benefit. The members are: Jim Greig, Jack Laird, Barry Brickell, Adrian Cotter, Helen Mason, Mirek Smisek, Warren Tippett, Michael Trumic, Janet and Wilf Wright, secretary.

FOREWORD

DAVID P. MILLAR,

Director
The Dowse Art Gallery
Lower Hutt.

Pottery was once almost a family affair. The building of a new kiln was shared by the whole pottery community, who watched, or helped in its construction with enthusiastic pleasure. It was easy to name the leading potters — their names were household ones within the craft. But in the last few years, the situation has changed. The numbers involved in pottery have so expanded, especially in the Auckland area, that a survey of the scene is an increasingly complex affair.

The ultimate effect of this increasing activity and numbers is hard to determine. It will certainly make it more difficult for younger artists to get recognition outside their own immediate region or circle of friends. It may provoke many of them to move away from domestic ware and try ceramic sculpture, where greater individuality can be achieved by dramatic and various means.

Amongst established potters, it may provoke the desire to establish an academy of standards, despite history's warnings that a control over technique often spills over into a control over inspiration. The recent history of the Royal Academy and the Paris Salon ought to be a solemn warning to those wishing to institutionalize creativity into a straitjacket of acceptable techniques. Standards need watching, but so do the institutionalizing of them.

One thing will remain constant — potters will need to continue exhibiting. The question is — who will do the exhibiting?

The great advantage of an exhibition like the present one, is that it enables one to see a substantial slice of New Zealand pottery at one viewing.

But the problem besetting an exhibition like this is that every year more people are available for inclusion than before, and that in the future it may be so crowded as to be visually indigestible. Moreover, the larger the exhibition, the more debased it may seem in the eyes of an increasing number of viewers and exhibitors.

There are two ways in which changes can take place. Both are legitimate, but both will cause heart-burning. But art has always progressed via civil wars, palace revolutions or debate. The ceramic sculptor may break from the domestic ware potter, on the grounds that his understanding of clay and pottery is greatly at variance with the other. There could therefore develop two national exhibitions — one of domestic ware, the other containing sculpture.

This is, however, probably unlikely. For while such a division according to form may appeal to the critic or historian, it is a division within pottery that probably does not run as deep as status and economics. The division between the part-time potter and the professional is much more fundamental, and the source of increasing anxiety as the potters' population increases. The full-time potter fears for his economic livelihood and his newly-gained independence. The part-timer fears for his artistic status, threatened as it is by the professional.

This division, which is increasing in depth all the time, may result in two exhibition venues — one for the full-timer, the other for the part-timer.

I pass no value judgment on this situation. I am simply aware of an increasing polarization within what was once the happy freemasonry of pottery — a polarization that would seem to make some division on the line I have outlined inevitable, even if to many it seems regrettable, or even unpardonable.
